Excerpt: .and intellectual aspirations of the people, as Edward Everett Hale, Phillips Brooks, and Bishop Vincent. It is, of course, very easy to find many things to criticise in so complex and multiform an organisation as this. A fastidious academic cynic is struck by its irregular and unorthodox character, and is fain to regard it as bearing the same relation to a really learned society that the Salvation Army bears to the regularly organised and decorous churches. He may urge with some truth that there is a good deal of superficial reading encouraged by the circles; that many of the members are not real students; and that the power to write papers which may perchance be copied from books or prepared with the help of others is no true test of the student's own application or knowledge. But even he will admit that the...
